

Style Guide for Graduate Catalog Course Descriptions

The purpose of the Graduate Catalog is to provide current, concise, and accurate information about graduate policies and programs for the guidance of prospective and current students, members of the faculty and administrative staff, and officers of allied agencies. Consistent catalog style is important because it leads to efficient language and ease of use. This document is the style guide for course descriptions, which are the most common elements of the graduate catalog, and the elements most subject to variations in style.

Effective course catalog descriptions inform the reader of the most important course concepts in clear, concise language that can be understood by experts in the field and prospective students. As shown in the examples below, the preferred catalog style typically uses sentence fragments rather than complete sentences, present-tense verbs rather than the future tense, and lists course content rather than explains or defines it. A full sentence is used only when it's the clearest and most efficient way to communicate the meaning.

Example of Style Elements to Avoid (#1), with Revision (#1R)

1	SPACELIFE 547 LUNAR LANDSCAPING (3-0-3)(F Odd years) With an increasing number of full-time residents on the moon, lunar landscaping is becoming a psychological necessity. Lunar landscaping adapts earthly landscaping concepts to the moon's environment. This course explores key principles of landscape space and materials to achieve functional and aesthetic effects. Topics include lunar soils, effects of temperature, and Tranquil topography. Design challenges of selecting objects and securing them, employing mechanized features such as dust falls and rock slides, and designing paths for moonwalking in space suits. Students will develop computer simulations of a one-acre lunar garden conforming to legal specifications of UNSPACE.

Examples of Preferred Catalog Style, #2-9

Examples 2-9 are taken from Boise State's 2014-2015 Graduate Catalog and serve as exemplars of preferred catalog style. These eight examples include essential course content and include, if relevant, a central and/or somewhat unusual course requirement of students. In the catalog, full Comment [1]: Explains or gives rationale for course.

Comment [2]: Definition of "lunar landscaping."

Comment [3]: "This course" is unnecessarily redundant.

Comment [4]: "Topics" is acceptable, but not necessary to introduce a list of course topics. "Topics includes" means that the topics must be covered every time the course is taught, but "Topics may include" gives the instructor flexibility each time the course is taught.

Comment [5]: Future verb tense

Comment [6]: When listing 3 or more items in a series, include a comma after the final item before the conjunction , in this case, "and."

sentences are sometimes used to state student requirements or outcomes, helping to distinguish this information from information related to concepts of course content.

Examples 2-4 show course descriptions that use sentence fragments starting with present-tense verbs. The course title is the understood subject of these verbs:
